Yesterday, a meeting of delegates to the Zionist Congress took place in Tel Aviv. Herzog came and spoke. Netanyahu canceled his own participation, officially because of other obligations, in fact because he learned that thousands of hostile demonstrators were waiting for him. On that same day, negotiations between the two sides took place for seven hours at the President's Residence in Jerusalem: the atmosphere is supposedly positive, but the positions are still very far apart.

A terror attack in Jerusalem, near the Machane Yehuda market: eight people run over by a car, wounded to various degrees. The driver has been "neutralized," according to the police.

On the television program Face the Nation, Netanyahu was pushed quite hard by the tough interviewer Margaret Brennan. He had to admit that Golan would not be appointed as consul general in New York, that he had had to cancel his attendance at the meeting of Zionist Congress delegates in Tel Aviv because of demonstrations against him, and that he would rein in Smotrich and Ben-Gvir, etc. In short, not a very impressive performance by the PM on the seventy-fifth anniversary of the State of Israel. Incidentally, he tried to use an old trick of his, to create a sense of intimacy by calling the journalist "Margaret," but she did not reciprocate with "Bibi" …

This evening, the official commemoration ceremony for the fallen soldiers. Ben-Gvir seems to be the controversial politician to insist on speaking. We shall see what happens.

Over 10,000 participants in a joint Israeli-Palestinian commemoration ceremony organized by the "Forum of Bereaved Families for Peace" in Hayarkon Park in Tel Aviv. The ceremony was able to take place after some 150 Palestinians were authorized to cross over to Israel from the West Bank. Defense Minister Gallant had forbidden this, but the Supreme Court
