Tomorrow, the “protest of a million” is to take place in front of the Knesset. It is a protest that has been worked on for several weeks by supporters of the judicial overhaul. Levin, Rotman, and Smotrich are scheduled to participate; their main slogan: “They won’t steal the results of the elections from us.” Netanyahu has been invited but will not attend “for security reasons.” It is reported, however, that he actively participated in the preparations. From the news, it is not clear whether Shas will also be there. The Orthodox parties will abstain. It all means that part of the coalition will push for the passage of the judicial overhaul when the Knesset reconvenes.

A Knesset member of Ben-Gvir’s Jewish Power is proposing a law aimed at applying the criteria of the Law of Return to employment in all government offices. Outright discrimination against non-Jews.

Thursday, April 27

About 100,000 participants in the demonstration in Jerusalem in support of the judicial overhaul. Officially, the Likud financed some 5 percent of it, which means that it actually financed somewhat more. But never mind, they organized their thing quite well, even having a corner for Orthodox participants. They, however, didn’t come.

Levin showed that he would be quite at ease in Ben-Gvir’s party: he gave a speech that was nothing less than pure hatred against the Supreme Court and the worst demagogic poison that can be imagined. I don’t know whether Jerusalem has heard anything that foul for a long time. What a shame! The goal is obvious: to put an end to the conciliation talks that continue in the meantime at the President’s Residence.

The more I think about it, the more it becomes obvious: the goal of Levin is not only to put an end to the conciliation talks, but to become the next leader of the Likud, to push Netanyahu out of the way. If nobody stops him, he may bring disaster on the country.
