If the budget is not approved within exactly a month, new elections have to be held.

Sunday, April 30

In opening the summer session of the Knesset, Netanyahu declared that he is convinced the compromise talks at the President's Residence can succeed and that he fully supports them. This was a quasi-direct answer to Levin's declaration at the Jerusalem demonstration that the overhaul has to be voted now and that the PM should stop giving in.

Right-wing activists planned to protest in front of retired Chief Justice Aharon Barak's house in Tel Aviv. This was enough to bring hundreds of people to his house to demonstrate their solidarity. All in all, fifty right-wing activists remained. In the Knesset, the Orthodox parties agreed to postpone the discussion of the law regarding the military service of the Yeshivot students. The discussion of the budget should bring them massive benefits; this is therefore a priority for them, as for the other coalition parties.

An astonishing new poll. If elections took place today:

Gantz's party: 30 mandates.
Likud: 25 mandates.
Present Coalition: 51 members out of 120.
Present Opposition: 63 members out of 120.
Whom would you prefer as PM?

Gantz: 43 percent.

Netanyahu: 33 percent.

If the compromise discussions do not succeed, what should be the fate of the judicial overhaul?
