Abandon it: 55 percent.
Push ahead: 29 percent.

Quite sensational indeed! If only the discussions about the budget could fail.

Monday, May 1

In Israel, there is no international workers' day celebration anymore, only relentless internal fighting. It will probably reach its most intense moment during this Knesset session: Gantz said today that there was no real progress in the president's talks and that the opposition will not allow the coalition to play for time. But what can he do, except leave the talks? Netanyahu declared that an understanding was possible; he is almost certainly playing for time. The whole situation is quite explosive, since no solution is in sight.

Edelstein, a senior member of the Likud, declared that the party responsible for the failure of the talks will not find him with it. It is encouraging, but one MK is not sufficient to change the majority. Hopefully, some more will follow. In yesterday's poll, only 8 percent considered the judicial overhaul a priority. On the other hand, among the demonstrators against Aharon Barak, one heard a voice shouting: "The people voted Yariv Levin."

Tuesday, May 2

For now, the Orthodox Degel HaTorah party refuses to accept the postponement of the law concerning the military service of yeshivot students. They want it now, before discussing the budget. "If you cannot deliver it now," Rabbi Meir Porush, the grand old man of the party, declared