Friday, May 19

An interesting report in the evening news: more and more ultrareligious young males—but still a minority—turn to studying what they were forbidden up to now in their milieu: secular topics such as English, mathematics, and other such subjects. Otherwise, they will have no access to the economy and remain living off their wives' meager salaries, from alms, and from governmental allocations.

Incidentally, as I have indicated, if the budget does not get through by the given legal date, the government will fall. The evil clown will not dare to bring the coalition down, but the ultra-Orthodox may.

Saturday, May 20

Today, for the twentieth week, demonstrations all over the country, after they had to stop during the military operations against the Islamic Jihad, for security reasons.

Sunday, May 21

The evil clown Ben-Gvir cannot let a day go by without some provocation: now he has gone to the Temple Mount. Of course, several Muslim countries are up in arms. What a disgusting type! His former political partner Smotrich, who is supposed to attend a meeting of the OECD finance ministers in Paris, is unable to schedule any meeting, either at the French Finance Ministry or with officials of the City of Paris. One may wonder in what language he will speak if he opens his mouth at the general meeting. The two clowns are not talking to each other anymore, because of the budget. Ben-Gvir accuses Smotrich of discriminating against the minister for the Negev and the Galilee, Yitzhak Wasserlauf from Jewish Power, to