at its beginnings. We all worked well together and even went on an outing to Jerusalem—to the Supreme Court—where the main secretary knew one of the justices. He invited us to a court session. These were the limits of my judicial experience, but not the reason for my telling this story.

I met Rosenne again in the early 1970s when he was appointed ambassador to the United Nations in Geneva, and I was teaching there at the Graduate Institute of International and Development Studies. We became quite friendly, and I had discussions with him on international law, not on its theoretical aspects of course, but on the multiple interpretations of this or that event which he had to deal with, particularly in his tiffs with the UN Human Rights Commission. By then, my attitude to the Palestinian issue was probably to the left of his, but, in any case, he had an official position to defend. It taught me that law was not only in the text, but in its interpretation. And, to get back to our present situation, whatever the results of the compromise negotiations may be in our current conundrum, they may depend on the interpretation given to them by a political majority.

Iran displayed a ballistic missile that could reach Israel.

Friday, May 26

Yesterday, President Biden published his program to fight growing antisemitism in the United States. Nothing very new, except that such a program, as well-meaning as it may be, will be of little help against a millenary hatred.

My criterion of “hatred” to identify antisemitism is much too rough. Various degrees of antipathy or animosity against Jews can lead to the spewing of antisemitic rantings; defining where to set the line between objective criticism of Jews or Israel and antisemitism can be tricky. To keep silent because of indecision about the nature of the anti-Jewish criticism is