I knew Ben-Porat from the time in the early 1950s when we served together in the same intelligence unit, in which he remained and had reached a command position by 1973. After the war, he came to visit me in Jerusalem on several occasions and told me of his warnings, although not about "the horse," the Egyptian Ashraf Marwan, Nasser's son-in-law. Marwan, incidentally, may have been a double spy; whatever his role, many years later, he fell from the seventh-floor balcony of his apartment in London … The incomprehensible aspect remains the refusal of the chief of intelligence, Eli Zeira, to take the warnings seriously and transmit them at least to the chief of staff. Ben-Porat died in 2007.

I don't know why this has turned into a sensation, since all of it has been known for many years. Could it be to warn of some similar lack of vigilance?

Avi Maoz, the archenemy of the LGBTQ community, is back in his old position as a kind of inspector-supervisor of educational programs, fighting against his enemies and also supervising the strengthening of Jewishness in education, thanks to Netanyahu, who made sure that he got some budget contribution. In short, the full coalition is back. Only the judicial overhaul is still on hold. For how long?

We are getting very close to the outcome of the conversations at the President's Residence. Netanyahu has declared that the judicial reform is not dead, but that he believes in a consensus. Gantz makes clear that all eyes will be open to look for any hidden clause. All eyes are vital when we deal with a master liar of Netanyahu's caliber.

The coalition has turned the Homesh settlement, which it had promised to leave empty, into a religious school. The Americans expressed their opposition; it seems not to help.
