Tuesday, May 30

I do not understand exactly what the attorney general rejected in relation to Netanyahu's trial, but it seems to make the trial more threatening for him. It may make him even more intent on getting the judicial overhaul through the Knesset. The only way for him to get a plea deal is to leave the political stage, which he will never agree to do. His situation is not unlike that of Trump, except that Trump has not much chance of getting back to power, while Netanyahu is desperately clinging to power.

June 14 has been chosen as the deadline for the negotiations at the President's Residence. In the meantime, it seems that the representatives of the opposition will reach an agreement about who will be their delegate in the Knesset commission for the election of judges.

Wednesday, May 31

The fateful negotiations gain in intensity with each day; the focus is on the Judicial Selection Committee, which Justice Minister Levin threatens not to convene if he does not get the changes to it that he wants (the date for convening the commission is June 14, which is why this was chosen as a deadline for coming to a compromise at the President's Residence).

Tomorrow, the yearly march of the LGBTQ community will take place in Jerusalem, under heavy police protection. Ben-Gvir plans to be present, but it is not clear why. The great-grandson of Rabbi Ovadia Yosef (the late Sephardi Chief Rabbi of Israel and founder of Shas) will participate in the march; he is a rabbi and an educator. The country needs more people like him.

Thursday, June 1