worse. In short, Netanyahu has a few issues to take care of, more or less simultaneously.

Saturday, June 3

Three soldiers killed near the southern border by an Egyptian infiltrator.

Tens of thousands of demonstrators in Tel Aviv and all over the country for the twenty-second week.

Sunday, June 4

You probably know that old joke about the Jew who was shipwrecked, and who finds refuge on a desert island. When he is discovered, his saviors are astonished to find that he built two synagogues. “Why two?” they ask him. “One is for me,” he answers, “the other, I never would set my feet in.” From the amusing to the tragic: when getting ready for the revolt, the remaining inhabitants of the Warsaw ghetto and their fighting units remained divided to the end in three political groups: Socialists, Bundists, and Betar. With the third one, the two others never agreed to cooperate and they hardly cooperated among themselves. The survivors made sure to write diverging histories, trying to garner all recognition for their own group. This does not bode well for the hoped-for reunification of the two segments of society fighting in present-day Israel, in case of external danger. But how can one come to terms with enemies of democracy and supporters of religious fanaticism? Lapid declared that his party will not vote for any law agreed upon in the compromise negotiations until the Judicial Selection Committee is convened.

Monday, June 5