would receive fifty seats, the opposition would reach sixty, and nine would be undetermined (Arab votes). Quite a crash for Netanyahu.

Saturday, June 17

The twenty-fourth week of protests: tens of thousands of demonstrators in Tel Aviv and tens of thousands more all over the country.

Sunday, June 18

Today, Netanyahu announced that active steps would be taken to bring back the judicial overhaul, after weeks of waiting for the results of inconclusive negotiations at the President's Residence. If he can be believed for once, it means that the crisis is back, in full force.

Given the present situation, each vote inside the commission for the appointment of judges counts. In two days from now, elections to the national lawyers' committee will take place and, in principle, they have two delegates on the Knesset commission. If the Likud manages to have its candidates appointed …

Monday, June 19

President Herzog denied the coalition's assertion that an agreement was reached on several points that could now be debated and voted on in the Knesset, for example, regarding the "plausibility argument." This, among other things, has allowed the Supreme Court to annul a government decision because it was not plausible. Thus, the appointment of Deri as minister was annulled, as it was highly implausible that somebody guilty of a felony could be minister. Now, according to the law in preparation, governmental and ministerial decisions will be immune from such