cancelation of the plausibility law, unless a minimum of five coalition members vote against it.

It looks that this is precisely what may happen. Defense Minister Gallant announced that he will not remain indifferent to the air force crisis and that he plans to announce his response this coming Monday. Moreover, Shas's boss Deri stated that he too is worried and will probably take a stand. In the meantime, we know that some other Likud members will possibly not support the cancelation of the plausibility law. Of course, much depends on what Netanyahu says in secret to them all.

It has become the mightiest expression of protests: thousands have joined the march from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem (40,000 as a start, say the protest organizers). They will station themselves in front of the Knesset on the days of the vote.

Eight in the evening in Israel: tens of thousands have reached Jerusalem and plan to camp in front of the Knesset tomorrow. I am proud to say that my son and my daughter-in-law, as well as my daughter (visiting from Berlin) are among them. I wish so much to have been there.

About 100,000 protesters reached Jerusalem and will sleep under tents in Sacher Park. About 150,000 are gathering in Tel Aviv. The chair of the Histadrut declared that he will call a general strike if left no choice, but he is notoriously unreliable.

All over the country, tension in anticipation of the coming days increases.

Further drama in these already dramatic hours. The cardiologist who took care of Netanyahu last week was called urgently during the night: the PM is in immediate need of the pacemaker implant. The meeting of the cabinet that was scheduled to take place tomorrow morning, which included
