My wife, Orna, and I have different views about the effectiveness of the demonstrations. I said that one of their main and striking aspects was that they were protests without real anger, while the other side was filled with resentment and anger; the best example being the growing brutality of the police. I was astonished that the tens of thousands of demonstrators didn't yet react with anger of their own. Orna argues that this is precisely the beautiful side of our demonstrations: protests bon enfant, in a way. For me, without anger you will never ultimately get to the only result that can make a difference: civil disobedience.

The attorney general opposes the cancelation of the plausibility law: "It is meant to facilitate Netanyahu's personal situation." As a result of the above —and following several appeals to the Supreme Court against the vote—a forum of eleven judges will debate its legality sometime toward the end of August.

On the other hand, there is some background noise about new attempts between the two opposing sides to reach a compromise.

In the meantime, religious parties are demanding the vote of a new law that would establish equal status between military service and Torah study. Otherwise, they will not support the judicial overhaul. Their usual extortion tactics.

Severe economic consequences are expected following yesterday's vote. Several rating agencies downgraded their estimates of Israeli credit worthiness for investors. The shekel and Israeli stocks are down, etc.

Netanyahu's coalition has slipped to a prospective fifty-two seats according to the latest polls. The Shas party journal warns against proceeding with the judicial overhaul.
