President Herzog has openly pointed to Netanyahu as the person most responsible for the current crisis and the one who has to resolve it, “as he is the one who has the power.” The chairman of the coalition, MK Ofir Katz, hastened to call the declaration by the president “unfortunate.”

The Supreme Court will start to debate the cancelation of the plausibility law in September. Then it will address Levin’s refusal to convene the Judicial Selection Committee. Why so late?

The thousands who spent the last few nights in Sacher Park in Jerusalem express the great spirit felt by all, of the spontaneous friendships, of the devotion and care shown by the people who supplied the protesters with tents, food, and water, and after a few days cleaned the grounds to perfection. Orna says that it is so heartening to see this wonderful side of our people. I agree, it is heartening and it is wonderful, but I am afraid, as I have noted before, that great spirits and exemplary citizenship will not make any impression on the fanatics of the coalition. Maybe the growing refusal to volunteer for call-ups among officers of elite units and pilots will be a decisive factor.

Today, the Knesset voted on a law according to which every community of more than 700 inhabitants could decide who was allowed to live there and who was not: undisguised apartheid.

Before the passage of the first measure of the overhaul, there were some thirty physicians or medical students who had applied via WhatsApp for relocation out of the country. Now there are 2,000. Hard to believe!

The coalition is set to significantly weaken the position of the attorney general by passing a law that would split his or her authority in several parts. However, they will have to wait until October, when the Knesset reconvenes from its summer recess.

It may be the right time to conclude this diary.
