Judaism thrive in the Jewish state? Why the accelerating rush toward fanaticism?

Saturday, January 21

Much has happened today. Smotrich announced that he would not participate in the weekly government meeting tomorrow, which may indicate he is thinking of bolting from the coalition and triggering new elections. This is, of course, the most optimistic scenario. On the other side of the political spectrum, Esther Hayut, the president of the Supreme Court and the first to take a public stand against justice minister Yariv Levin's "judicial reform," let it be known that if the Knesset approved the overhaul, she would not resign but would continue fighting. Among the opposition figures, Hayut is the most admirable, while the politicians who headed the previous government, such as Yair Lapid and Benny Gantz, have lost much of their authority.

Some 130,000 anti-Netanyahu demonstrators took to the streets in Israeli cities, 100,000 of them in Tel Aviv.

Sunday, January 22

Netanyahu "regretfully" fired Deri. The judicial reforms will possibly bring him back.

"Hi, elephant, you have become quite visible."

"Yes, everybody in the room knows me and, guess what, everybody loves me. I was everybody's pet for decades, but not as openly as today. Now, I mean everything for all those in power and for many other Israelis." As the reader will have guessed, this pet is none other than Israeli settling in the Occupied Territories. This is a very long story. I will only just begin it today.