happened on October 7, but they describe the political blindness in Israel and the horror show that was Netanyahu's coalition. But all that is irrelevant for the time being. Let me turn back to events.

A correspondent in Sderot on this third day of the war reports that Hamas militants are still hiding in a variety of locations on Israeli territory around Gaza. They continue to fight sporadically and appear to be well camouflaged. Tens have been killed, but some apparently remain. The only grocery open in the town is operated by Mofida, an Arab woman who has resided in Sderot for more than twenty-five years. She sells food, clothing, and a wide variety of other basic necessities; her son delivers goods to those who are unable to visit themselves. Mofida says that she is not afraid. After all these years, the inhabitants of Sderot are her family.

It has become increasingly difficult to get a clear picture of what is going on. Individual eyewitness testimonies shared from the region are hard to believe and even harder to stomach. The estimate of the number of Israelis killed is probably close to 1,000. The first two days in the South, where the Hamas terrorists penetrated, was the scene of an unprecedented massacre.

One of the most brutal and appalling attacks occurred on the border, near Re'im, where hundreds of young music lovers had assembled for a festival in the desert, without any protection, any forewarning, in the deepest peace. In addition, there was a change of venue, which Hamas knew all about. After dancing the whole night, many of the young festivalgoers slept for a few hours and were then awakened to the sound of bullets. Some 300 corpses have been uncovered to date. The road leading to the festival is lined with hundreds of their abandoned cars.

In comments by the foreign press, often informed by Israeli sources, one of the recurring themes is the incomprehensible failure of Israeli intelligence, which over the years has been praised to heaven. There are many other examples from other countries over the previous decades, but Israel is too small and fundamentally too weak to be comforted by the
