announced that it had been a false alarm. The chaos in Israel reminds me of the poet Christian Morgenstern's wall, built only from holes.

Netanyahu's failure becomes increasingly blatant: American sources confirm that three days before the Hamas attack, the Egyptian minister of intelligence warned our PM about something big coming from Gaza. There was no reaction—or rather, there was total indifference.

Let me return to the problem of attempting to further a two-state solution. One of the early conditions will have to be the exclusion of Islamists and Jihadists, as well as the neutralization of Iran's influence. That will be one of the difficult tasks to achieve. The other will be overcoming opposition to any compromise with the Palestinians from the annexationist part of Israeli society, which supports the present coalition, including the half million settlers who may comprise the wildest group of all. The resistance encountered during the evacuation of Gaza in 2004 was nothing in comparison. And today, of course, there is no Ariel Sharon around.

Tonight we had a tiny preview of what could happen: about 100 members of La Familia, a right-wing extremist group, attempted to break into Sheba Medical Center in Ramat Gan, where a wounded Hamas terrorist was being taken care of. They were contained by police and hospital security. The wounded Hamas member had previously been transferred to a police hospital. Yet this indicates what can be expected on a large scale if steps are taken toward a neutralization of our settlers.

Tomorrow there will be a Knesset vote to confirm the unity government established today: there is no doubt of a positive outcome. Lapid and Avigdor Lieberman have not joined yet. The main advantage, hopefully, should be the sidelining of Smotrich and Ben-Gvir.

Gaza is now under complete siege and Israeli troops have amassed on the periphery, apparently ready for an invasion. In their joint announcement, Netanyahu and Gantz announced the formation of the unity government that they promised would liquidate Hamas. It means entering the enclave,
