York Times, it appears that Iran was involved in some measure in these preparations.

Reserve units of paratroopers describe a lack of necessary weapons as they mobilize. Elite units apparently lack breastplates. Again and again, one cannot believe the level of unpreparedness, but then it is reinforced by similar examples from alternative sources. The various intelligence agencies were deeply asleep, the army supply system was on a prolonged vacation, the army operational division went home, and all the upper ranks of the IDF were probably in Bali or at least in the Alps. As for the chief of staff …

And leading the charge we encounter "King Bibi," as some called him until a few days ago, polishing his crown and smiling to the mirror—with Sara'le at his side, of course. He spoke again today, repeating exactly the same things he has said every day since October 7, that "we will break Hamas's bones." Well, you are no Churchill, sir.

On the news tonight, an inhabitant of Nir Oz shared that his mother and his son disappeared when Hamas evacuated the kibbutz. To this day, he has not received information from an official source, not a visit or even a word of support. From the tragic to the tragicomic: the army released surveillance balloons in three locations around Gaza. A few days before the attack, the balloons fell. Because the technician who could repair them was busy, they were left on the ground. Now it has become clear that Hamas had shot them down in preparation for the onslaught …

The Israeli population includes many admirable people, but its political leadership and many of its institutions have been in a state of decomposition for many months, certainly since the most recent elections, in December 2022, which hoisted the present coalition to power. Many of us hope that the postwar reckoning will be pitiless.

According to a new poll, 86 percent of Israelis, including 79 percent who supported the coalition, think that Netanyahu should resign.
