Since the beginning of the conflict, the BBC has played its typical pro-Palestinian role. For the British radio and television center, the Hamas people who entered Israel and killed or abducted civilians wherever they could are not “terrorists” but “militants.” This seems not unrelated to an antisemitism often attributed to the BBC. Stronger anti-Jewish sentiment will undoubtedly rise again in many countries, and support for Israel will weaken, as the prolongation of the war increases the number of Palestinian civilian casualties and suffering in Gaza and possibly elsewhere.

The humanitarian situation in the Gaza Strip is horrendous. The number of dead is estimated at over 2,200, and hospitals cannot cope with the constant influx of wounded. As I already mentioned, two of the main hospitals in the North of the enclave have refused to evacuate because they have nowhere to go. This creates major difficulties for the planned Israeli entry into the enclave and will demand precautions that may hamper military operations.

Sunday, October 15

The army still hasn’t entered Gaza, eight days after the beginning of the war. There must be a strategic reason, somehow linked to Iran. Are Israel and the US waiting for some Iranian intervention in order to strike Tehran? Is the entry into Gaza just a sideshow that will come later, after Iran is knocked out? All of this is plausible and could explain why the US is moving a second carrier, the USS Eisenhower, and its strike group to the eastern Mediterranean.

The chaotic situation on the Israeli side, on the eve of Hamas’s onslaught, is further demonstrated by new information: after receiving news on October 6 of an imminent attack, the head of Shin Bet arrived in the South, as did an elite unit of the service. The commander of the army division in the region was apparently informed (although he denies it), but