arsenal of Iranian weapons via Egypt through a well-oiled system of bribes. By shooting at the Egyptian position, Israel is signaling that it is well aware of the traffic. Whether there were weapons hidden in today's humanitarian convoys remains an open question. Later, President Biden and Prime Minister Netanyahu agreed that humanitarian aid to Gaza would continue.

From day one of the conflict, the arena of Western public opinion, particularly the European one, has been engulfed in a free-for-all—in fact, in a mud-slinging match—the likes of which haven't been seen for many years. On each side, raw emotions have taken over and feelings of belonging to a community, in some cases dormant for a long time, have suddenly resurfaced. And from day one, people who do not belong to either community have also joined the fight, either because of vague affinities with one side or the other, or because it allows them, indirectly or explicitly, to push an agenda that couldn't as easily be peddled in quieter times, or even that, in normal circumstances, would be considered a hate crime: anti-immigrant rhetoric and Islamophobia on one side, antisemitism on the other. Of course, there are also hardcore ideologists on both extremes. That's where we are, in the UK, France, and Germany in particular. For the time being, there haven't been major explosions of violence. But in such volatile circumstances, it can be enough to strike a match to create a firestorm.

Netanyahu is holding off on a ground invasion of Gaza for the time being, probably at the request of the American president.

Monday, October 23

According to Israeli officials, instruction booklets were found on dead bodies of Hamas terrorists killed in the South detailing how to use cyanide to prepare explosives for chemical warfare. The information was repeated