by President Herzog in an interview with Sky News two days ago. The booklets are actually al Qaeda booklets from the early 2000s.

Another humanitarian aid shipment was allowed to enter Gaza today. Apparently, such shipments will be allowed daily from now on, after Israeli inspection.

Despite repeated denials, it seems that there are differences of opinion between Defense Minister Gallant and the IDF on the one hand, and Netanyahu and people close to him on the other. Gallant and the army are convinced that Hamas cannot be destroyed without a ground offensive but warn that military operations in Gaza may take months. Netanyahu seems hesitant to launch a ground offensive that may be drawn out and deadly. The fact is, as Shas leader Deri admitted today, that no military plans were ready and everything has to be prepared as events are unfolding. This total lack of foresight is the direct result of Netanyahu's view that Hamas was only interested in economic advantages, and that as long as you feed the beast it remains quiet. Interestingly enough, Bennett, who was the temporary head of a pre-Netanyahu centrist coalition, offered his mea culpa today. Netanyahu, who engineered most of prewar Israel's policies during his repeated premierships, remains silent on the matter.

According to an article by Nahum Barnea, one of Israel's most reliable political commentators, previous suggestions of a crisis of confidence between Netanyahu and Gallant, as well as between the PM and his senior military commanders, are correct. Netanyahu detests Gallant. Several months before the war, he wanted to dismiss him for speaking against the judicial overhaul and its disastrous impact on the army but had to let him remain due to the vast support for the defense minister among the opposition, which was so vocal on the streets at that time. Moreover, the PM holds the army command responsible for all the blunders that led to October 7. That will certainly be his defense when the hard questions are asked after the war. In the meantime, this lack of confidence hampers any
