the Jewish people." I am afraid that a situation like the present one encourages them, but they remain a small minority.

Second, an essentially political question is of the essence: will the tilting of public opinion in the Palestinians' favor influence decision-makers? This is mostly a problem for European leaders, although the US president cannot but take into consideration the looming 2024 elections, particularly if the progressive segment of the Democrats comes to play an increasing role. There is also a very different aspect to the surge of pro-Palestinian sentiment: its overestimation in Tehran. The launch of attacks against Israel and the US could cost the ayatollahs the survival of their atrocious regime.

In their effort to retrieve whatever was left behind by the victims of October 7 and by their murderers, Shin Bet and Military Intelligence say they found the cell phone of one of the victims near Re'im, which her killer used to call his parents in Gaza (the conversation was recorded on the phone): "Dad, I call to tell you that I killed the Jew whose phone I am using, and with my own hands I killed ten other Jews—yes, ten—with my own hands. Open WhatsApp and you will see all the dead." The father: "May God protect you." The killer then shared his feat with his mother and got her blessing. Foreign Minister Eli Cohen read a transcript of the phone call to the UN Security Council, on the occasion of a special debate regarding the Israel-Hamas war.

According to various reports, mainly American ones, it seems that to this day, Israel has no clear military plan for its ground operation in Gaza. Will it use special forces and limit its operations to surgical strikes, or will it instead stage a massive show of force? How does one avoid large numbers of military and civilian casualties? Where is the exit plan? How does one get out of Hamas's tunnels—the "Gaza Metro," as they call them? It
