in policy toward the Occupied Territories. With demonstrations in front of Netanyahu's house, one notices a resurgence of the deep distrust of most Israelis toward the present coalition and its head, notwithstanding the war.

The external challenge has already been mentioned. It is the growing pressure for humanitarian pauses, which may turn into a ceasefire that allows Hamas to regroup and replenish its arsenal.

Brazilian authorities foiled an alleged terror attack by Hezbollah against synagogues, on a tip from Mossad.

Thursday, November 9

After a ten-hour fight, a unit of the Nahal Brigade took control of a Hamas underground tunnel in the Northeast of Gaza. It found considerable intelligence material and the organization's battle plans, and killed Hamas's commander of antitank operations. Yesterday, some 50,000 additional inhabitants of the northern part of Gaza evacuated to the South, many more than in the previous days.

Germany has banned all Palestinian organizations supporting Hamas, particularly the Palestinian Samidoun group, which organized celebrations for the Hamas terror attack of October 7.

In an article in the New York Times, Tom Friedman, on a visit in Israel, calls Netanyahu "the worst leader Israel has ever had," on the basis that for the sake of maintaining his extremist right-wing coalition, he rejects any possibility of a two-state solution that would not only garner support from moderate Palestinians but give Israel the public backing of moderate Arab states that it lacks now. It would also give President Biden the political justification for all-out support of Israel. Friedman is absolutely right, and hopefully the country will get rid of Bibi at the first opportunity. There is enough anger going around to dump the PM many times over. My worry is that even a moderate center-left or center-right coalition will balk at the