Half a million anti-Israeli demonstrators in London. Jeremy Corbyn, the former Labour leader, harangued the crowd.

Did the British example influence the French president, who, after an early show of friendship for Israel, unexpectedly took a decisive anti-Israeli position in an interview with the BBC, demanding a ceasefire in Gaza and accusing Israel of murdering women and children in its ruthless bombing campaign? Or is Macron worried about potential trouble among France's large North African immigrant population?

In Riyadh, a two-day meeting of the Arab League and the Organization of Islamic Cooperation commenced. The aggressive rhetoric in Riyadh is not new, but the handshake of Mohammed bin Salman, the Saudi leader, and of the Iranian leader Ebrahim Raisi could signal the emergence of an Islamic bloc that may become dangerous for Israel.

In Gaza, the battle will have to go on for a long time—contrary to my bouts of optimism, here and there—since Hamas still controls the essential part of approximately 500 kilometers of tunnels, built at the cost of approximately $1 billion, with reserves of fuel and food that can last for a very long time.

A spate of polls proves once more that the Israeli people's confidence in its present government and leaders is at an all-time low. The respondents recognize the harm caused by the attempted judicial overhaul. They have full confidence in the army and want an aggressive center-right government under Gantz. There is very little support for negotiations with the Palestinians.

Yesterday, about 80,000 Palestinians left northern Gaza for the South, the largest number of daily evacuees yet. On videos shot on the scene one sees Hamas people trying to hamper the flight, manifestly without success.

Nothing new was said in the press conference held today by Netanyahu, Gallant, and Gantz. This unusual conference of the three together was probably convened in order to show that Netanyahu is part of a political
