common front that can bring victory. In fact, the only interesting aspect of the meeting was a photograph of Gallant and Gantz holding each other's shoulders in a friendly greeting, while neither one made such a gesture to Netanyahu. This spoke louder than any rhetoric about unity that the PM has tried desperately to put across. Netanyahu repeated on this occasion that the IDF would be in charge of security in the Gaza enclave after the war, a position contrary to the American wish to give the Palestinian Authority full responsibility, in the framework of a solution to the Palestinian question.

A march against antisemitism will take place today in Paris. President Macron supports it, although he won't participate. The far-right leader Marine Le Pen will attend, which incited the far left to boycott the event.

Representatives of French Jewish organizations expressed their displeasure at Le Pen's participation, recalling that her father, the founder of the Front National, was an extreme antisemite and Nazi collaborator. France's prime minister, Élisabeth Borne, will speak. Macron called President Herzog and more or less apologized for yesterday's declarations.

The situation in the Gaza hospitals is hard to bear. There's no concrete news from the ground operation near Al-Shifa Hospital.

Today the New York Times ran a long article about the slaughter near the Re'im music festival on October 7. It described in detail the flight of one group who tried to hide in a bunker built along the road leading out of Re'im. Hamas found it and slaughtered most of them, also taking several as hostages. An escapee told the story. Some of the charred corpses were found a few days ago but were so disfigured that identification was almost impossible.

In a series of interviews with American networks, Netanyahu refused once more to answer the question of his responsibility for the October 7
