and its militants are fleeing to the South. If that is so, the fighting should soon be over. But where are Yahya Sinwar and company? I hope that Gallant doesn't mistake his wishes for reality.

According to the Israeli foreign minister, the IDF still has two or three weeks before support from allies wanes due to the loss of civilian lives. If Hamas is not defeated, what then?

An Israeli force entered Al-Rantisi Hospital. President Biden spoke about the liberation of hostages and the conflict with the emir of Qatar but did not mention a ceasefire at this point.

Tuesday, November 14

The armed wing of Hamas offered to liberate seventy hostages in exchange for a five-day ceasefire. It means that Hamas is in dire straits and needs a respite. It doesn't seem that Israel will agree to such a lengthy pause.

The idea outlined by two Knesset members of a voluntary population transfer of Gaza inhabitants to neighboring Arab countries, supported by Smotrich and angrily rejected by Egypt's foreign minister, is of course a nonstarter, coming from the Israeli extremists of Netanyahu's coalition. Another aspect of the coalition's intentions can be seen in the particularly aggressive policy enacted in the West Bank. The evil clown Ben-Gvir is encouraging this policy with the distribution of weapons and creation of self-defense groups all over Israel, particularly in the West Bank settlements. Some of the settlers wear army uniforms and act as if they were soldiers; more often than not, they are backed by the army in their acts of violence against the population. Seven Palestinians were killed yesterday in one of the antiterrorist operations that go on day after day, with Hamas members killed each time. In short, the coalition's policy is to use the war situation in order to get a total grip on the Occupied Territories, one way or
