the other. But the more pressure used, the greater the danger of radicalization among the population.

A march supportive of Israel and against antisemitism will take place this afternoon on the National Mall in Washington, DC. Tens of thousands of participants are expected. Pro-Israel marches in several European countries have garnered the support of hard-right political figures such as Marine Le Pen in France and Suella Braverman in England (dismissed yesterday as home secretary by Rishi Sunak). As already mentioned, the pro-Israel stance of these supporters is merely another way of expressing their hatred of immigrants, mainly from the Middle East and North Africa. In the US, there is no sign of this specific kind of alliance, but Israel is strongly supported by another sort of extreme right wing: the evangelical Christians, because of their messianic expectations. Incidentally, the messianism of the evangelicals does not fit exactly that of Ben-Gvir and his ilk. According to the latest reports, some 300,000 people participated in the march in Washington.

There is little doubt by now that the IDF ground operation in Gaza is successful. But does this mean that Hamas as an ideology and even as an organization will disappear? If it survives, the main task must be to impede it from reforming as a terrorist force, close to Israel and capable of attacking it again. That is why Netanyahu wants Israel to keep control of security in the Gaza Strip after the war. How does one achieve that without reoccupying the enclave?

Wednesday, November 15

Israeli ground forces entered Al-Shifa Hospital. Moreover, they captured the Hamas parliament building and other sites that symbolized the organization’s control of the enclave. A new proposal from Hamas for the liberation of some of the hostages: fifty women and children for three days