received warnings that they would be considered deserters and could get ten years in prison. They now have to be treated for post-traumatic stress. A very sad and revolting episode in many ways.

According to Hamas, a ceasefire of several days will start tomorrow at 11:00 a.m. and fifty hostages will be freed. Israel denied that an agreement had been reached, but a confirmation from Qatar was submitted to the war cabinet.

Danny Cohen, formerly BBC's director of television, has demanded an independent inquiry into the BBC's blatantly anti-Israel reporting since the October 7 attack by Hamas. The anti-Israel attitude of the corporation has been noticed on several occasions in the past and it seems that its journalists covering Middle Eastern affairs are a priori hostile to Israel.

Ben-Gvir cannot miss an opportunity to be seen and heard and to promote something, anything, as long as it is repulsive. Now he has found it necessary to speak to the families of hostages and to use the occasion to promote a new law imposing the death sentence on terrorists. The families protested and pointed to the danger for their loved ones, who are still held by Hamas. The evil clown did not relent. No such law will be discussed in the Knesset anyway, but Ben-Gvir has had his publicity stunt.

A hostage deal is now seriously in the making: 53 hostages, mainly children, their mothers, and elderly women will be exchanged for 150 Palestinian women and youngsters and a four-day ceasefire. The war cabinet and the government will discuss the proposal this evening. The key to future exchanges is a one-day ceasefire for ten hostages and three Palestinians liberated for each Israeli hostage. All Israeli military and security entities are in favor of the deal.
