case of other sections. In any event, much will have to change in the IDF in general.

One hundred and three hostages have been released; 145, mostly men, remain in captivity. A US spokesman declared that the president was intent on continuing the ceasefire and on the release of further hostages. According to the spokesman, Hamas was responsible for the resumption of the fighting because it wasn't able to deliver a list of further hostages for release.

But it's only on Israel that the US can put pressure. When being told by the war cabinet that eradicating Hamas could take months, Secretary of State Blinken supposedly answered: "I don't think you have the credit for that."

Israel is apparently circulating a map of the enclave among Arab countries, with the indication of a demilitarized zone that should separate Gaza from Israel as the basis for a postwar agreement. Some Arab countries have rejected it, but others are ready to take it into consideration.

It is very hard for me to read the individual testimonies of ordinary Palestinians in the areas that are presently attacked. People have nowhere to go, and where they are, they live in horrible conditions. Is there no other way of getting at Hamas?

Nowadays, Israeli kids are unavoidably exposed to short films about the atrocities committed by Hamas on October 7, which are all over the internet. Naturally, they are deeply affected, often traumatized, by this and by the pervasive sense of danger. How do parents deal with the traumas of their children, how do they answer their anxious questions? But I am also told that there has never been such readiness to enlist, even among people
