This certainly does not hinder one of the most visible television journalists, Ayala Hasson, from spewing her weekly Friday night pro-Netanyahu propaganda. Incidentally, it was the same journalist who came out with the story that destroyed Avi Himi.

A few days ago I reported that, after the Supreme Court's massive majority decision (ten to one), Netanyahu had to dismiss Aryeh Deri. Apparently, Deri, impervious to all of this, continues to work as interior minister and health minister, either from his office or from his home. Didn't he famously declare in a Shas party meeting: "If they oust us through the door, we will come back through the window; if they oust us after that, we will come back through the roof"? The PM will certainly not send the police to arrest him for crass flouting of court decisions. Israel has become a jungle with some very dangerous predators.

Take Ben-Gvir. Where there is an opening for misdeeds, there he is. For example, he looks for any way of imposing harsher conditions on Palestinian prison inmates. He wants to reintroduce the death sentence for terror attacks. In the meantime he has managed to inflame the atmosphere by ordering all sorts of sanctions, including against women prisoners. This has heightened tension with Hamas and may lead to a generalized explosion. Ben-Gvir is the most objectionable and disgusting figure amid this entire gallery of freaks.

The trouble is that although I know all of this, I remain viscerally attached to the country where I arrived of my own volition, as a fifteen-year-old, post-Shoah orphan. At first I brooked no criticism, then things changed—but whatever my growing reservations may have been, the deep attachment to Israel as such, to its unconditional survival, remains. It would not occur to me that for Jews everywhere such an attachment is imperative. Not at all. And I am well aware of the fact that young American Jewish liberals had become disenchanted with the country well before the present government emerged. Israel is not an answer to antisemitism; in some
