cases, it reinforces antisemitism. But, for many of my vanishing generation, the attachment remains irrational and unshakable. This very attachment pushes those who still can to fight for the survival of what possibly was an illusion, a dream, but a dream that gave a meaning to their (our) entire lives.

The attachment wasn't entirely irrational until now. Orna and I have not lived in Israel since my retirement, for a set of purely practical reasons (health coverage, etc.). But we know how vibrant and friendly Israeli society still can be (particularly in Tel Aviv …), and on more than one occasion we considered moving back. Until now. And, from what I read and hear, not a few Israelis think of moving out.

Yesterday, during their meeting in Paris, the French president Emmanuel Macron warned Netanyahu that if the judicial reform was voted on and imposed, Israel would not be considered a democracy anymore. What could it mean? Hungary, a typical European authoritarian regime, doesn't seem to be suffering in any way … Should Netanyahu be more worried than Orbán? At least Macron's body language expressed his feelings: Netanyahu tried repeatedly to hug him to prove their close friendship; Macron did not respond even once.

More importantly for the immediate future: Roni Alsheich, the former chief of the national police, will speak tomorrow in Tel Aviv at the protest demonstration against the judicial reform. From what we know, he will warn, as all others have done, that the reform means a regime change granting unlimited power to the government. But beyond this, he will probably point out that he is speaking as a religious Jew, thereby addressing the vast group of progovernment religious Jews. Will he mention also that he speaks as a Sephardi Jew, a matter of considerable importance that could counteract the constant efforts of Ben-Gvir to get full control, as minister of
