Monday may prove an important day. Rotman will try to ram the first reading of some of the judicial reforms through the Knesset judiciary committee. The opposition will use all possible delaying tactics. But the real drama will take place outside of the Knesset: a mass demonstration against the reform should fill the streets of Jerusalem and a day of widespread strikes is supposed to paralyze much of the country. Let's hope that it all takes place as planned.

In the meantime, Ben-Gvir is expected to summon the chief of the Jerusalem police, Doron Turgeman, to a disciplinary talk.

Today, the sixth weekly demonstrations took place in Tel Aviv and other cities. In Tel Aviv, according to the organizers, some 150,000 people participated; tens of thousands more marched in other cities.

Sunday, February 12

At today's meeting of the government, ministers resolved to introduce a law that would limit the authority of the Supreme Court to intervene in government appointments. This would allow the reappointment of Aryeh Deri as minister of the interior and minister of health. Informally, the law is known as "Deri law 2." The proposal has to be voted by a majority of the Knesset and accepted by the Supreme Court. For once, members of the opposition have issued a joint warning against the initiative. And, exceptionally, President Herzog will speak to the country in a few hours from now. One cannot expect much from somebody like Herzog, but let's wait and see.

In the meantime, Ben-Gvir continues to announce that he ordered the police, etc., etc. Former police chiefs have compared him to an irresponsible mischief-maker, a small child, or a stand-up comedian. Netanyahu cannot dismiss him, because doing that would be the end of his Knesset majority.
