The cabinet also voted for the cancelation of the Incapacitation Law, which allows the attorney general to recommend that the prime minister or any other minister be declared unfit to fulfill his or her functions, if dealing with matters touching on subjects related to his or her current indictments. The first Knesset vote on its revocation will take place in a few days.

Two days ago, Haaretz published a cartoon showing Netanyahu, with Sara'le and son Yair, as Nero singing while Rome is burning; Herzog is holding a tiny bucket of water …

In response to the dismissal of the director of the Israeli National Library, considered too liberal by the new education minister, people whose manuscripts and other papers are deposited at the library (including me) have decided to retrieve them and find other archives.

The de-escalation summit that took place in Aqaba, Jordan, with the participation of officials from Israel, Jordan, the Palestinian Authority, Egypt, and the United States, led to some positive decisions, such as the stop on discussion of new settlement units for four months and on authorization of outposts for six months. It has little chance of success, however: Hamas called it "worthless," while Smotrich declared immediately that the settlements were under his authority and new initiatives would not stop for a minute. As for Ben-Gvir, he put it simply: what took place in Jordan, remains in Jordan.

After the shooting in Huwara, a savage rampage by hundreds of settlers: torching of Palestinian cars and of tens of homes, one Palestinian killed, dozens wounded, general destruction. About 400 settlers were involved in this unparalleled mayhem. During the assault, which lasted some three hours, neither police nor army appeared on the scene. Where were they? Everybody on Twitter knew; they did not? Nobody informed them of what was happening? Or maybe they were ordered not to intervene? Six people were arrested at first, but all were released. Ultimately some two settlers are
