disgust. Smotrich should not be allowed entry into the United States. Neither should Netanyahu.

As usual, in the midst of this unprecedented turmoil, Sara'le is offering some comic relief. She found the perfect day to visit her Tel Aviv hairdresser. People found out and soon hundreds were demonstrating in front of the hair salon. The police had to rescue the careless wife in an armored car as the demonstrators chanted: "The country is burning and Sara is getting a haircut." In Hebrew it rhymes: Hamedina boeret veSarah mistaperet. The joke is that Sara'le was not intimidated in the least; she insisted on having a full three hours of hairdressing and documented on selfies the stages of her beautification, while tens of horse-mounted policemen were blocking demonstrators from approaching the salon, helicopters hovered overhead, an armored car was standing at the ready, the Shin Bet was mobilized … Some conspiracy specialists assume that her wily husband managed the whole opera from afar and then staged, for the TV channels and the reporters, the highly moving reunion with his beloved Sara'le, who appeared to suffer from post-traumatic stress.

Will Netanyahu give the order to attack Iran ahead of schedule, to save himself and his coalition? The man's egotistic madness is so monumental that any such step is possible, notwithstanding the overall risks. The trouble is that very few people in the country are knowledgeable enough to weigh responsibly on the decision. And is the US kept informed of all our Napoleon's decisions? It is doubtful.

I have told elsewhere of my work with Shimon Peres in 1960–61. I was a very small cog in a huge machine, although I carried an impressive title: head of the Scientific Office of the Vice-Minister of Defense. I had inherited the job of a truly impressive person, Shalhevet Freier, who left
