etc., and a state that would be essentially liberal and secular. Grosso modo, the first one for the Mizrahim, the second one for the Ashkenazim … This is, of course, not very serious, but it is probably the first time that such an extravagant idea has been aired. Unfortunately, a not-so-hidden racism suffuses it. It is the unmentioned plague of this whole situation.

A group of specialists came up with compromise suggestions that Levin calls a breakthrough. But, as far as all such news is reliable, the fanatic justice minister is not ready to stop the overhaul process during negotiations. I assume that if he insists on continuing his blitz campaign, there will be no compromise acceptable to the opposition.

Settlers attempted again to create chaos in Huwara before being stopped at the last moment.

Moody's Investors Service, one of the companies that sets the international credit rating of countries, warned of a potential downgrading of Israel if the judicial overhaul is voted. It seems that Netanyahu is getting worried by the dire consequences in a vast number of domains and is trying to slow Levin down, without success up to now.

The translator from Hebrew to Italian refuses to translate the speech Netanyahu is supposed to deliver at a Rome synagogue on Friday: it is a speech that is dangerous for democracy in Israel, she declared. About the visit, some have written that Netanyahu is joining Giorgia Meloni in "international isolation." The opposition will attempt to prevent Bibi's and Sara'le's departure by blocking access to the airport; Ben-Gvir swore to keep it open. The police will use force.

My friend Kobi is calling Rotman a "Savanarola with tzitzes" (tassles). Good, but Rotman is not the problem. The problem is Netanyahu and, possibly, Levin.
