immediate coming together of both sides around an agreed-upon project. That part looks like his past demands; it will not work if Levin and Rotman do not stop rushing through with the legislation.

Terror attack in Tel Aviv: three people badly wounded. The attacker, who was found hiding in the staircase of one of the surrounding buildings, fled into an alley and was shot there. Now the police are looking for whoever brought him.

The chief of staff admitted that the army failed in Huwara.

The commander of the air force reinstated the colonel who was dismissed yesterday for his involvement in the reserve pilots' threat not to report for call-ups if the judicial overhaul was passed.

The dismissal of the Tel Aviv police chief Amihai Eshed, on Ben-Gvir's orders to Commander of Police Shabtai, was put on ice by the attorney-general when it became clear that Shabtai acted under pressure from the minister. A number of police chiefs demand Shabtai's resignation.

In today's article in the New York Times, "The Social Rifts That Led to Israel's Judicial Crisis," Patrick Kingsley, the Jerusalem bureau chief of the paper, points to the origins of the present confrontation in the 1990s, when Chief Justice Aharon Barak established the authority of the Supreme Court over political constituencies such as the settlers' movement and the ultra-Orthodox community. In other words, the court represented the position of liberal-minded, secular Israelis against the extreme-nationalist and extreme-religious communities. The court did occasionally protect Palestinians against settler encroachments (it was not excessively liberal regarding Palestinian rights) and limited the attempts of the Haredim to escape military service. It supported the evacuation of the Gaza Strip and the demolition of its settlements. Thus the court became a focus of hatred for
