go shopping. Public protests have followed them to Italy.

Hopefully, Netanyahu enjoys his Roman holiday, notwithstanding a serious diplomatic defeat: the agreement between Saudi Arabia and Iran to restore relations, after seven years of rupture. Our PM, dead set on isolating Iran internationally and constantly hinting at a forthcoming rapprochement with the Saudis, got exactly the opposite. Under its new government, Israel has no foreign policy anymore and is facing growing isolation; the Iran–Saudi agreement is one more failure, and a dangerous one.

This evening, the tenth week of demonstrations. Somewhat before 8:00 p.m., about 50,000 demonstrators in Haifa, the largest protest the city has ever seen. In every city and town in the country, even in very small locations, thousands take part. The movement is getting much stronger by the week.

Some 180,000 demonstrators in Tel Aviv.

Police commander Yakov Shabtai declared tonight, regarding his submission to Ben-Gvir's order for the dismissal of the Tel Aviv police chief : "I was wrong regarding the time and the way; it will happen after Ramadan." But he did not cancel the dismissal. He is probably too afraid of being himself dismissed by Ben-Gvir.

Did you notice? Netanyahu was away in Rome for the last three days; at the end of this week, he will be in Berlin, and on the following week in London … It seems that he is keen on being away from his country at the time of its worst crisis. In fact, he will not be at the only place where he would love to be seen: at the White House.

The PM came out against the attorney general on the police issue: the government alone has authority over the police. Also regarding dismissals and nominations within the force? Yesterday, on the television evening
