news, Ben-Gvir was beside himself regarding the police issue. It looked as if we were about to witness an act of God. But no, not this time. The man is probably planning the attorney general's dismissal.

The same Ben-Gvir has apparently also decided to cause as much damage as possible to the Bedouins. Without any order having been publicized, a sudden surge of house destructions is taking place in the Negev. Some of the houses had been built decades ago.

Yesterday, in the online news, some idiotic commentator congratulated Levin and Rotman as the DJs of a new party in which even Netanyahu belongs already to the past. Without mentioning Amsalem, but using his arguments, he welcomed the new party guests, the new elite that is throwing out yesterday's oligarchy, in particular the Rehavia judges, who in the opinion of this dumbass form a small group of self-appointed masters opposed to the nation's elected representatives. Those elected representatives, he forgot to add, are rushing to eradicate democracy and, according to the polls, are opposed by a majority of Israelis.

Levin and Rotman do not plan to pause, even for a day: during the week, they will present the "override law," which permits a Knesset majority to reverse a Supreme Court decision. It is at the core of the entire overhaul.

My former university, Tel Aviv University, organized a week of debates about the judicial reform during which some speakers defended the overhaul and were sharply criticized by militant students from the opposition. The rector, Professor Mark Steif, wrote a strongly worded letter attacking the students and got an even sharper response. The question is how far, in a fight for democracy, opinions of the opponents of democracy should be given free expression in an academic debate, in a liberal university, under the guise of even-handedness.

Ehud Barak declared on CNN that Israelis should opt for civil disobedience if the Knesset passes the judicial overhaul that would paralyze
