Today, the Knesset is about to vote on three major laws at the heart of the overhaul. Amsalem, the clown we have already met several times, will introduce a further law: a prime minister in office cannot be indicted for a whole series of misdemeanors or felonies. This should trigger a strong response from the Supreme Court, if it is approved.

At the end of the week, Netanyahu will be on his way to Berlin. There, thousands of demonstrators will hopefully be waiting for him.

Police Commander Shabtai told his district chiefs that he is the only one authorized to speak with Ben-Gvir on any operational matter. In other words, if Ben-Gvir gives operational instructions to a district chief during a demonstration, he should be referred back to Shabtai. Ben-Gvir's entourage explains the commander's instructions as stemming from pressure coming from the attorney general. The police should be proud of one major achievement: all in all, there have been no demonstrators seriously injured during the last ten weeks. That is probably not what Ben-Gvir is proud of.

Israel is on its way to become an authoritarian, apartheid theocracy, something like a mixture of the old South Africa and contemporary Iran. Two constituencies are competing to achieve this as fast as possible: the settlers and the ultra-Orthodox. An unholy alliance, if there ever was one. It appears that even Orthodox women are worried by the upcoming tightening of religious laws. Apparently, the religious legislation will also spread to areas that have been in the secular domain up till now. Among the Orthodox Knesset members, Moshe Gafni is the one pushing their legislation. Demonstrations are planned in front of his house in Bnei Brak (a town of ultrareligious inhabitants).

President Herzog, on receiving the honorary citizenship of Tel Aviv, announced that he was about to propose an ultimate compromise, after having heard from people on all sides. The problem is that, even if Herzog's compromise is acceptable, it remains unlikely that the coalition will be
