ready to stop the rush toward finalizing the overhaul, and the opposition will be unwilling to talk while the rush goes on.

Ben-Gvir did not wait to react to Shabtai's instructions to police district chiefs not to speak directly with the minister: he is holding a conference with them.

The Saudis did not allow the Israeli minister of tourism to attend the international tourism conference, organized by the United Nations, which is taking place in their country.

The Knesset majority voted in a first reading for the cancelation of the exclusion law, called in semi-slang "the fortification law." After the final vote, it will protect the prime minister from being excluded from matters connected with his own indictments. The same for Deri.

In the early morning hours, the Knesset voted for the "override law" (How hahitgabrut). This law, if it is enacted (after three votes), will essentially eliminate the judiciary's political influence.

On Wednesday, Netanyahu will be on his way to Berlin. According to a senior commentator on security matters, the PM's weekly trips to Europe aim to prod European leaders to convince Washington—which doesn't hasten to invite him— to impose, together with them, the "snap back" clause of the prior agreement with Iran on the Islamic Republic; this clause would allow a weapons embargo, among other sanctions. Iran's weapons exports to Russia, helping Putin in his aggression against Ukraine, amply justify such a "snap back." According to the same commentator, up to now the Europeans have listened politely but have not promised anything. It seems doubtful that they will go along with a man of so tarnished a reputation as today's Netanyahu. But at least this maneuver allows him and Sara'le their weekly escapades.
