One thousand Israeli personalities from all fields have addressed a letter to Scholz and to Sunak, asking them not to meet with Netanyahu, in view of the regime change he is overseeing.

The overall picture is as weird as can be: a modern and highly successful country rushing toward its demise, under the stewardship of a politician who doesn't care a damn for the ideological goals of his acolytes. More than half the population appears to be opposed to this collective craziness but, up to now, that fact doesn't halt the rush to national suicide.

Strangely enough, from its inception seventy-five years ago, Israel has survived and prospered with the same apparently incompatible groups within its body politic: a liberal, secular, majority; the ultra-Orthodox religious; and the messianic ultra-nationalists. The growth of the two groups of ultras was noticed, but not considered a serious danger until Netanyahu, at the helm of the traditional right, managed to cobble together the coalition that is now in the hands of its most extreme elements. The extremes dictate policies and, when thwarted, even slightly, threaten to leave the coalition and bring about new elections. Coming now, with a majority of the population turning against them, such elections would be a catastrophe for the traditional right, the Likud; for the ultras, who would lose the benefits they can achieve at this moment; and for Netanyahu personally. They all know it. But they rush on like a herd of lemmings toward collective demise, the demise of the country as such.

Tomorrow, there will be attempts to disrupt Netanyahu's departure for Berlin. Today, a demonstration took place in front of Moshe Gafni's house in Bnei Brak, a town of ultrareligious inhabitants. The demonstrators were pelted with tomatoes and eggs. In the Likud there is a simmering discontent regarding the direction in which things are moving.

Once the laws included in the overhaul are voted and somebody appeals against them (there will be many such appeals), the Supreme Court will have to vote on their constitutionality. There is little doubt that the court
