will reject the whole package, if no major changes are introduced. Then what?

After the pogrom in Huwara, two of the alleged ringleaders were arrested and put on trial. The court let them go due to lack of proof. Gallant, the defense minister, sent them to administrative detention. Today, fifty Knesset members of the coalition signed a petition to Gallant to free them.

In Merom Hagalil, a little girl of twelve prepared for weeks to sing at some celebration. Today, her performance was canceled because of the presence of some ultra-Orthodox men in the audience. In Ramat Gan, a thoroughly secular city, the municipal swimming pool was compelled to impose separate bathing hours for men and women …

Not to be left behind, Moshe Gafni introduced legislation for a massive increase in job openings for Haredim (the ultra-Orthodox). The question is: what kind of jobs can people fill, who never went through a regular school curriculum, who never learned the most basic English or mathematics, not to speak of anything else, except for Torah and Talmud?

After two days in the States, Smotrich is hastening back to “follow the overhaul.” Maybe, it’s because nobody wants to see him in Washington? The media in Israel are full with jokes about our finance minister’s English.

He wasn’t even able to read correctly what had been prepared for him in writing. It doesn’t seem to bother him; after all, instead of going to school, he spent his time pushing the Palestinians out of the redeemed land of greater Israel.

Netanyahu’s trip to Berlin will be very short: he is leaving tonight and coming back tomorrow, officially due to a security issue kept strictly under wraps for the last few days. There are also internal debates within the coalition about a potential compromise regarding the overhaul. A bad
