Likud accepted Rotman's "compromise" on the overhaul, particularly regarding the nomination of the next two justices. The Knesset vote will start tomorrow. Of course, it will pass. Netanyahu will do anything to escape condemnation. The Supreme Court will probably oppose the law. Justice Minister Levin declared today that the Knesset will not allow opposition from the court.

Today, the Knesset will vote, in a first round, for "Deri law 2." The law, to be adopted, must get through a second and third vote. It will get through. It remains probable, however, that, again, the Supreme Court will declare the law unconstitutional. Will the Knesset not allow this either? Supposedly, all this should take place in the next two weeks, before Passover.

The tension between Ben-Gvir and Police commander Shabtai is worsening: the commander wanted to name a senior officer to an important position; Ben-Gvir refused to confirm the nomination. Shabtai then appointed the officer as his personal assistant, but the minister avoids signing off on the appointment. In the meantime, Knesset member Amsalem is threatening Shabtai: people will be arrested, don't be among them.

Yesterday the Knesset reversed the decision taken under Arik Sharon's premiership, in 2005, to evacuate a few settlements near Nablus. The Knesset calls this the "cancelation of the separation law." Settlers had already infiltrated one of the abandoned settlements, Homesh, which became a symbol of their defiance. Now, the settlers have won. As Peace Now declared: "A Messianic Revolution is taking place … This government will inevitably destroy our country." That is correct, but what are you doing to stop the Revolution? Unfortunately, the General Federation of Labour, the Histadrut, remains passive.
