Sunak. Against all tradition, there was no common declaration after the talks. A crowd of Israelis demonstrated against Netanyahu, all along the route from the airport to the front of 10 Downing Street. But, as usual, the N's enjoy their European holiday (the third within a month). Maybe, in fact, they don't enjoy it so much. Sara'le hoped to leave their hotel through a back door, but demonstrators had it covered so she had to get back. Poor N's.

A courageous speech by the president of my university, Tel Aviv University, against the judicial overhaul. He spoke about the possibility of the university going on strike. Will other universities follow? I wonder whether there won't be budgetary reprisals.

The only thing that could explain Netanyahu's weird behavior is that he plans an attack on Iran in the very near future. It would put an end to the protests, restore national unity, and save his skin. It could mean heavy retaliation from Iran and its allies, particularly Hezbollah, and a very difficult moment for Israel.

According to rather precise and detailed information, on the Palestinian side there is an ongoing debate between two strategies: either try to hasten Israel's demise, or leave it to stew in its own juices.

The army, responsible for the security situation in the West Bank, is using all possible means of de-escalation, particularly with the start of Ramadan. In direct opposition to this policy, Ben-Gvir and the police accelerate the destruction of houses built without permits in East Jerusalem and cancel any partial easing for Palestinian security prisoners, even for women—an easing usually permitted for Ramadan.

If the attorney general sends Netanyahu to the Supreme Court for meddling in the judicial overhaul, because of a conflict of interest given his existing legal troubles, and if the Supreme Court condemns Netanyahu for a breach of the law and he doesn't react according to whatever the court enjoins, the country will have officially reached a full-fledged regime crisis.
