same: postponement until after Independence Day, that is, until May, which may lead to major changes. Huge applause from the demonstrators all over the country. Let's see how Netanyahu will react. It seems that he has no choice but to postpone. That could be the end of his coalition, but I am not sure.

Of course, Ben-Gvir calls for the dismissal of Gallant and all those who demand a postponement of the overhaul. The apocalyptic but not unrealistic view could be that the crazies will accept the postponement, wait patiently until after Independence Day, and then resume the overhaul to its bitter end. It would be difficult to restart the protests again after such a break.

Sunday, March 26

The chief of staff, the head of the Mossad, and the head of the Shin Bet are reported to share Gallant's concerns about the legislative blitz. Israel's enemies are aware of the internal rift and are ready to exploit it. That couldn't be clearer. But nothing seems to slow down our crazies or impress Netanyahu. How weird.

Former chiefs of staff, dozens of retired generals, and so on, declared that Gallant's warning demanded an immediate meeting of the security cabinet to discuss the situation. By refusing to call such a meeting, Netanyahu becomes personally responsible for whatever dire developments that may take place. Again, no reaction from Netanyahu. The man should be declared unfit and removed from office.

Another Netanyahu trick: the law on judicial appointments will be voted on, probably today, but the appointment committee will not be set up before negotiations with the opposition have taken place. Netanyahu to Herzog and Gantz. Herzog answered with a flat "no." Gantz seems ready to talk. How naive can he be! Or, how desperate to be in the good graces of the godfather?
