Seventy thousand demonstrators this Monday morning in front of the Knesset. The Ayalon Highway to Tel Aviv is sporadically blocked. Most flights to and from Ben Gurion Airport are canceled. Histadrut joining the protests seems to have been very effective.

Gallant did not yet receive the letter that confirms his dismissal. He spoke to the Security and Foreign Affairs Committee of the Knesset headed by Edelstein and gave details about the country's precarious situation.

Students' committees in secondary and junior high schools have decided on a strike from tomorrow on.

Netanyahu will supposedly announce the stopping of the judicial overhaul, but has not yet done so. Levin said that he would accept any decision. Smotrich and Ben-Gvir are against stopping. Of course. But even Ben-Gvir has not decided to vote against the coalition and bring it down. It is an internal Likud secession of the extreme right that probably worries the PM. Moreover, a right-wing counter-demonstration has been announced. It seems that the overhaul will be postponed to the summer session of the Knesset. Netanyahu may be waiting to see how the counter-demonstration fares.

According to news outlets, the counter-demonstrators are on their way to Jerusalem, to the Supreme Court. Netanyahu and Ben-Gvir apparently decided not to cancel the overhaul, but to slow it down. It should be accomplished by July. They probably hope that if the opposition protests have to stop for two or three months, they will not have the energy to resume.

Ben-Gvir, according to news, will receive a new private army, parallel to the police, a "National Guard." That is his price for remaining in the coalition. Netanyahu is ready to sell his mother to stay in power! If Ben-Gvir gets this private police, he may attempt to fight opponents on the streets, in due time. Very dangerous.
