supporters of Israel. Responding to a comment by the US ambassador in Israel that Netanyahu would be invited to the White House after Passover and Ramadan, a spokesman for the White House declared that no invitation was in the works. That should help a bit. To the opposition's amazement, the judicial appointments bill has been placed on the agenda and is ready for a second and third vote at a moment's notice. It is the main bill that has to be discussed at the president's. The coalition argues that formally submitting the law was just a procedural step.

In his press conference, Joe Biden may have said that Israel should drop the overhaul. Today, Netanyahu answered that Israel was a sovereign country and that even the best of friends should not meddle with its internal politics.

Lapid is quoting a twit from the Levin camp to one of Likud's MKs (members of Knesset) to show that the justice minister doesn't have the least intention to slow the legislative overhaul; Levin denies this. Most opposition politicians are skeptical regarding Netanyahu's intentions. They are right, and the submission of the judicial appointments bill is ample proof. Hopefully, the coming Saturday demonstration will show Netanyahu that his trick does not work.

It all reminds me of the following allegory about a driver at a crossroads who, instead of waiting his turn, accelerates. Of course, the other drivers let him through to avoid an accident. The trick works nine times out of ten, but on the tenth time, another driver decides to go by the rules when his turn comes around, and a collision takes place. The trickster doesn't survive.

It seems that a majority of coalition Knesset members are against voting now for the "contributions to Netanyahu law," a shameful law that reeks of corruption to the high heavens.
