officer. The internal investigations department of the police is looking into the shooting. Tomorrow, the Arabs of Israel will go on a general strike.

Police brutality against Israeli Arab citizens is well documented and reflects a much wider attitude. Now imagine what the behavior will be when Ben-Gvir gets his private army, thanks to Netanyahu. He is a declared Arab-hater and wishes to see as many of them as possible transferred beyond the country's borders and, if possible, to have the West Bank Palestinians transferred as well. Incidentally, the transfer of Arabs living within the future borders of a Jewish State is an idea as old as Zionism itself.

Some 175,000 demonstrators in Tel Aviv, many thousands in other cities and towns. The attempt to demobilize the protest movement may be failing. The main question: is the conciliation attempt genuine, or one more Netanyahu trick? In the meantime, Gallant has still not received his dismissal letter and continues to participate in the activities of his office, including a meeting with Netanyahu on defense issues.

Sunday, April 2

Simcha Rotman, the infamous chair of the Knesset Constitution, Law, and Justice Committee who, with Levin, is pushing the overhaul, declared to the New York Sun that the demonstrations were the beginning of "a war of religion" and made it clear that the reform drive would be resumed in due course. Simultaneously, Minister Miri Regev announced that the overhaul would start up again after Independence Day. Even if Netanyahu is minded to tone down some aspects of the overhaul, it's hard to see how he will get it swallowed by a majority of the Likud. After all, there are no more private armies to be handed out. Possibly, Miri Regev will be appointed defense minister (she was one of the candidates to replace Gallant). What else?
