Jimmy Carter’s last year in office, the bilateral issue with India that would come to the fore was its nuclear program. It was those two issues—Afghanistan-Pakistan and nuclear nonproliferation—that would dominate US-India strategic discussions for the next two decades. And during that period, and on those two issues, it would be China and the US, not India and the US, that would be on the same page.