suggests, it will be crucial for the two countries to synchronize not just the ends but also the ways and means, manage expectations, develop the terms of alignment, build habits of cooperation, institutionalize the relationship in a way that they did not in the past, deal with differences carefully, and support—rather than undermine—the other in dealing with various domestic constituencies. And, as the history shows, alignment is neither impossible nor inevitable. Nature might bring the two countries together as they deal with China, but without nurture, any such alignment will be unsustainable.