the Chinese government have not yielded any results. This is despite the Dalai Lama formally declaring in 1993 that he does not seek independence from China but only religious and cultural autonomy.

Three, in seeking to buttress the legitimacy of Chinese rule over Tibet, there is an effort among Chinese scholars to push the inclusion of Tibet into China to ‘ancient times’ and to even suggest that all the territories which were included in the most expansive phase of the Manchu Qing empire should be treated as organically Chinese, even if at certain points in history they were ruled by local regimes or by non-Han polities. This includes Tibet.

Four, given this history, Tibet has been and is likely to remain a critical element in the trajectory of India–China relations. It is unlikely that the India–China border issue will be resolved without some understanding being reached on the Tibet issue.

‘Treaty between Tibet and China AD. 821-822 (Translation from the Tibetan text)’, claudearpi.net.

The Jokhang monastery in Lhasa is the most important one.

As quoted in a note issued by the Chinese Embassy in New Delhi, 15 April 2015.

As quoted in ‘Convention Between Great Britain and Russia (1907) [391]’, tibetjustice.org.

A.S. Bhasin, Nehru, Tibet and China, Penguin Random House, 2021.

Ibid.

The four main sects of Tibetan Buddhism are the Nyingmapa, the oldest, the Sakya (Red Hat), the Gelugpa (Yellow Hat) and the Kagyu (Black Hat).

Elliot Sperling, ‘Tibet and China: The Interpretation of History Since 1950’, in ‘The Deadlock in Tibet’, China Perspectives 2009/3 | 2009, 1 September 2009.

Naomi Standen, ed., Demystifying China: New Understandings of Chinese History, Rowman & Littlefield, 2012.

Elliot Sperling, ‘Tibet and China: The Interpretation of History Since 1950’, in ‘The Deadlock in Tibet’, China Perspectives 2009/3 | 2009, 1 September 2009.